The clinical significance of subretinal fluid. Although the lamina cribrosa is only approximately 5 mm in diameter and traverses the retina almost vertically, it is possible to detect the presence of subretinal fluid (SRF). This happens in a wide variety of diseases of the eyes, although the etiology is usually different. In this review, the clinical significance of SRF is evaluated, and the usefulness of various diagnostic studies in SRF is summarized. The diagnosis of SRF is based on the observation of tears in the retinal layers on ophthalmoscopy or of a fluid-filled space between the retinal layers on indocyanine green angiography. Fluorescein or rhodamine-stained vitreous is also helpful to differentiate the presence of SRF from the presence of tears or vitreous strands. The most common causes of SRF are hereditary diseases of the retina, such as Best disease and retinitis pigmentosa. Acquired retinal diseases can also cause SRF, and infectious, vascular, hematological, endocrine, and neurodegenerative diseases can be associated with SRF. The location of the SRF can help narrow the differential diagnosis. In the majority of cases, SRF is serous and originates from the choroid. However, cystoid macular edema, for example, can produce cystic SRF. The iris or ciliary body is also a source of SRF. For instance, such sequences have been found for point-defects in silicon [Meyer2013], twisted bilayer graphene [Terrones2014],  $1T\text{-TaS}_2$  [Gong2017], strongly strained semiconductors [LeRoy2016], and charged impurities in ferromagnetic ultrathin films [Faehler2017]. The interaction of these defects with the lattice vibrations induces a Raman-active local mode in the Raman spectrum of the crystal, often referred to as “breathing mode”
