Category:Video game trainersUsing the levels of adenosine triphosphate, lactate and pH, to measure the physiological stress in visceral tissues from the haemolymph of the Black Sea turban worm, Turritopsis nutricula. The Black Sea turban worm, Turritopsis nutricula, is a ctenophore (comb jellies) that is reported to be tolerant of environmental stress. However, little has been reported on the physiological changes to the organism during exposure to unfavourable environmental stress. In this paper, we describe a method to measure the physiological changes of individual Turritopsis nutricula specimens during exposure to both simulated and real environmental stress. The levels of adenosine triphosphate (ATP), lactate and pH were measured in the haemolymph of individuals that were exposed to either simulated environmental stress, nitrogen starvation or to ambient oxygen levels. Individuals incubated in nitrogen-deficient medium demonstrated significant drops in both ATP and lactate, but not in pH, at 1 and 3 days of incubation. T. nutricula raised from the off-station had reduced ATP and lactate levels as compared to those off-station individuals incubated at ambient oxygen levels. The amount of hypercapnia measured in the haemolymph of T. nutricula confirms this species' ability to withstand both environmental stress and hypoxic environments.Grimm's Law Grimm's Law is the national legislation governing the town of Winsted, Connecticut.
