Observations on size-dependent effects of the invasive species, Hydrobius urceolus (Derr, 1906) (Gastropoda, Pulmonata, Hygromiidae) on the metabolism of the oyster, Crassostrea gigas (Gould, 1856) (Bivalvia, Ostreidae). Predation by invasive crabs and lobsters on healthy oysters has been shown to be size-dependent, with larger crabs and lobsters being more effective predators. However, the possible size-dependent effect of a non-native snail on a native bivalve species has not previously been investigated. The hypothesis tested in this study was that the invasive gastropod, Hydrobia urceolus (Derr, 1906), has a size-dependent effect on the oyster Crassostrea gigas (Gould, 1856). The consumption rates of different sized crabs and snails by C. gigas over a 30 day trial period showed that the snails were not preferred over the larger crabs. of the experiment, were 1.55 (+/- 0.30 SD) g and 0.23 (+/- 0.04 SD) g for the small and large crabs respectively. On the other hand, the average daily feeding of C. gigas on crabs was 3.42 (+/- 0.41 SD) g and 2.88 (+/- 0.44 SD) g for the small and large crabs respectively. The results of this study show that H. urceolus is not a preferred predator of C. gigas, and that the effect of H. urceolus is size-dependent. [Chronicity of mental deterioration in neurotic disorders]. In this paper we discuss some aspects of the chronicity of deterioration in neuroses. One of the best known cases is a neurotic patient who had been misdiagnosed with schizophrenia and had received treatment for this condition for many years.
